1. The Infatuation Stage:

The infatuation stage is characterized by intense emotions and a strong attraction towards someone. This stage is often fueled by physical and superficial qualities, with little knowledge of the person's true personality. It is a time when you believe that the person you are infatuated with is your soulmate, your perfect match.

2. The Reality Check Stage:

After the initial infatuation wears off, teenagers often face a reality check. You start noticing the flaws in your partner, conflicts arise, and the rose-tinted glasses fade away. This stage helps you realize that love encompasses both the good and the bad, and that compromise and understanding are essential for a healthy relationship.

3. The Self-Discovery Stage:

Teenage years are a crucial time for self-discovery. You begin to understand your values, interests, and the kind of person you want to be. This stage allows you to reflect on what you want from a relationship and what qualities you seek in a partner.

4. The Heartbreak Stage:

Heartbreak is an inevitable part of the teenage love journey. It may arise from unrequited feelings, misunderstandings, or the end of a relationship. While heartbreak can be painful, it also serves as a valuable learning experience. It teaches you resilience, the importance of self-love, and the ability to heal and move forward.
