Economic Powerhouses and Oil Dependence

Many Middle Eastern countries are known for their vast oil reserves, which have transformed them into economic powerhouses. However, this dependence on oil brings both prosperity and challenges. The management of these resources and the diversification of economies are crucial for the long-term stability and growth of the region.

Securing the Prize for the Middle East

Understanding the opportunities and challenges on the road to becoming a dominant global travel hub

What's Driving it?

Growth of emerging economies

International air travel patterns change with the emergence of new economies and growth of markets in Asia and Latin America.

Strong economic position compared with EU

The Middle East shows strong GDP growth, particularly when compared with the EU countries.

Investment in airport and IT infrastructure

Over $100 billion USD is earmarked for Middle East airport development. At Multinational Airport in Dubai has the aim of becoming the world's largest airport by 2016.

Geographical position

The central position provides many major global destinations via a single non-stop flight than any other hub.

Investment in aviation infrastructure

The national carriers have maintained investment levels (average 10% of all airlines for the next 10 years).

New routes, inter-regional focus and specialisation

Regional focus is a major factor with 1 million projects valued at $100 billion and 1 million new aircraft orders during the next 10 years.

Focus for Action

to overcome the barriers facing the development of the global hub

- Build a more effective regulatory framework across the region.
- Enhance greater financial transparency.
- Take a greater understanding of carrier behavior and needs in order to offer services and facilities that address the needs specifically to those people traveling to, from and within the Middle East.
- Middle East carriers should take a look at understanding agreements and membership of airline alliances.
- Mitigate the risk of over-development by learning from over-extended or global over-hubs.
- Promote greater financial engagement from foreign as well as national sources.

What's Preventing it?

Regulatory complexity

Airlines, airports and national authorities need to work together on visas, security and air control to offer more country connectivity.

Airline competition in the region

As the region's air traffic grows, a United States-style policy is needed.

Airport and airline overcapacity

Overcapacity may arise due to over-investment in infrastructure and airport capacity. Dubai, Abu Dhabi and Qatar, all due to reach their maximum capacity by 2016, need to be able to handle and handle infrastructure.

Fairness and transparency

There is the need for the Middle East to operate with a high level of business transparency.

It is necessary to demonstrate there is a split between regulation, funding and ownership of airports and airport infrastructure

The need to form alliances

The major Middle East carriers currently have an independent stance towards global alliances. The development of alliances is a key part of the plan to become the world's dominant hub. There is also the benefit of greater connections between airlines in the Middle East.
