In any case, these were by all account not the only adversaries of the dead against which precautionary measures must be taken, for both the embalmed body and the otherworldly components which had possessed it upon earth must be shielded from a huge number of demons and beasts, and from the forces of haziness for the most part. These forces of abhorrence had ghastly and unnerving shapes and frames, and their frequents were notable, for they swarmed the district through which the street of the dead lay when going from this world to the Kingdom of Osiris. The "immense divine beings" feared them, and were obliged to secure themselves by the utilization of spells and supernatural names, and expressions of force, which were formed and recorded by Thoth. Truth be told it was trusted in early times in Egypt that Ra the Sun-god owed his proceeded with presence to the ownership of a mystery name with which Thoth had given him. It was incomprehensible, notwithstanding for the Sun-god, to demolish this "Extraordinary Devil," however by presenting every morning the effective spell with which Thoth had given him he could incapacitate every one of Aapep's appendages and to ascend upon this world. From that point forward the "colossal divine beings," despite the fact that altruistically arranged towards them, were not ready to convey the dead from the fallen angels that lived upon the "bodies, souls, spirits, shadows and hearts of the dead," the Egyptians chose to summon the guide of Thoth in the interest of their dead and to place them under the insurance of his god-like spells. Motivated by Thoth the scholars of antiquated Egypt made a vast number out of funerary writings which were surely by and large use under the IVth line (around 3700 B. C. ),and were likely outstanding under the first administration, and all through the entire time of dynastic history Thoth was viewed as the writer of the "Book of the Dead."
