I continued down the valley road until I reached a police checkpoint where I was flagged to the side of the road. The officer asked for my ID, and when I showed him my USA driver's license he went ballistic; threatening me with arrest for not having an international DL. Nothing justifies police extortion, but if you're a foreigner cycling in Vietnam, you should accept the fact that when you are stopped by the police—they will take your money.

In this second volume, I will be taking an overnight bus up into the northern mountains of Sapa and visiting the local Hmong Hilltribes with their intricately designed fabrics. Next, I will attempt to summit 3,143m Mt. Fansipan; only to reluctantly retreat as the rain turned to numbing sleet. Finally, I will tour the countryside by motorcycle, smiling through a crooked police checkpoint, and remembering that it's much better to be happy than right.
